

Mr. Jones was an author & an easily pleased man; he was very pleased when he could quote something. He loved quoting - quite to be read, though he had not read to write he was angry when he read - & so he, if anything else there be. But really the greatest pleasure he had was when he could make a tangible, verifiable, but remote quotation. Somewhat Talmudic, Oriental, anti-classic Some little-known romanticist, some extinguished novelist - there, in the quotation thereof ~~all~~ the kernel of pleasure lay.

Mr. Jones was an author and an easily pleased man; he was very pleased when he could quote something. He loved quoting, quoting things he had read, things that he had not read, thing neither he nor anyone else had read - and so on, if anything else there be. But really, the greatest pleasure he had was such he could make a tangible, verifiable, but remote quotation. Something Talmudic, Oriental, anti-classic; some little-known romanticist, some extinguished novelist - there, in the quotation thereof ~~all~~ the kernel of pleasure lay.
